ALPENA WEEKLY ARGUS.

MISCELLANEOUS.

After the Storm.
Why, here's a story, that the old town of Alpena, Michigan, has had a very bad storm. The wind was so strong, that it blew down the chimneys, and the roofs of the houses were blown off. The water was so high, that it was in the houses. The people were so scared, that they were running about in the streets. The storm was so bad, that it was a great loss to the town.

Capitola.
Capitola Beggs! What a thorn in the side that name was to the unfortunate woman. "As if it were not misfortune enough," said Capitola, with a shake of her pretty head, "to have Beggs for a surname, without having such a headstrong little 'Capitola' tacked on to it."
Capitola's mother was a romantic little woman, with a decided weakness for the name of Beggs. It was just after the name of a favorite heroine had taken a violent hold on Mrs. Beggs's fancy.

he was in church this morning," added Jack. "A fine looking fellow, with brown hair and gray eyes. You saw him, didn't you, Cap?"
Cap was sitting at some little distance, in the wide old-fashioned window-seat, and appeared so deeply engrossed with some photographs and engravings, that Jack was forced to repeat the question.
But Cap, though her heart was all aflutter, pretended not to have noticed him, and answered indifferently to that effect. Oh, deceitful Cap!

After this Sunday, however, it seemed to Cap that, everywhere she went, Dr. Albion was the lion of the occasion. No one had been so popular in the village before. But he seemed to take little notice of Cap—Cap, who, up to this time, had been all eyes and ears. At last, he treated her with an amused indifference that to her, accustomed to the homage of the village youths, was infinitely galling.

WATER BATH.
Water bath, and spring was beginning to put forth its fresh buds, when, one day, Cap set forth on a pilgrimage in search of art. At last, he found it. He found it in the sweet-scented bloom, and was turning homeward, when suddenly it began to rain. It was one of those April showers that come without notice. Cap had no umbrella, and did not know what to do. Suddenly she heard a quick footstep behind her and, turning, faced Dr. Albion.

ACHES.

"I don't know what you can expect me to do—certainly, nothing that you would find very agreeable to hear." "That means you will not forgive me," he questioned, sadly.
"Forgive you?" flashed Cap, with passionate bitterness. "I wonder what you would think of me if I did. I wonder what you suppose I would think of myself, if I were silly enough, weak enough. No, I will never forgive you." "And those are your last words?" he asked. And if, Cap had glanced toward him, she would have seen how pale and troubled his handsome face grew; but Cap did not dare to look. "Your very last!"

"I hope they may be," she cried, violently. "I never want to see or speak to you again—never, never. I wonder how you dared even to think that I would forgive you, much less have the courage to ask it!"
She turned to go; she could not turn back. She must remain as she was. Poor foolish Cap, she was hurting her own heart as bitterly as she could be punishing him; but pride would not permit her to yield.
